HIT SUPPORT

Healthcare organizations might be in danger of falling apart for lack of Health Information Technology and qualified clinical specialists

Healthcare organizations are increasingly installing clinical information systems in response to both competitive market pressures and recent evidence on errors in medicine. These organizations recognize that all clinicians are important team members in the process of IT conception, design, installation and maintenance. This field will be one in which continued demand for trained specialists will be the norm.

Work environments for informatics are also far ranging, these include hospital, clinics, home care and long-term care, nursing schools, IT vendors and consultants, medical software companies, the pharmaceutical industry, and regulatory/governmental organizations.

Flexible Solutions for Your Business Needs

NURSE INFORMATICS & INFORMATION TECHNOLOGY

The demand for workers who understand healthcare information systems and technology is growing. The US department of Labor estimated a 4% growth in the demand for trained individuals prepared to be administrators, specialists, consultants, educators and researchers.

Finding the right talent is a whole other story. Career Medics HIT Division maintains a niche focus in key specialties, and is affiliated with many informatics organizations
